European Studies Faculty and Research Areas

Margot Irvine
Margot Irvine is interested in women’s access to careers in the arts in the late 19th and early 20th-century France and in the reception they received from literary and cultural institutions. She has published on women and literary prizes, prize juries, academies and literary collaborations between men and women. Her current work concerns women as founders of museums, women as public speakers in the late 19th century, and women writers’ epistolary networks.

Paola Mayer
Paola Mayer’s research interests focus on German Romantic aesthetics, myth and fairy tales in German Romantic literature, the uncanny and fantastic in German literature and thought from the eighteenth to the twentieth century, exile and Jewish writers in the early twentieth century. She has published on the reception of mysticism in German Romanticism, the aesthetics of fear in the eighteenth and early nineteenth century, German Romantic adaptations of myth and fairy tales, and satire between the two world wars.

Alan McDougall
Alan McDougall’s research focuses on transnational histories of European sport and culture, particularly football. He has published on football under communism, football and cinema, and youth cultures and youth politics in Cold War Germany. He is currently working on two projects: an international social history of Liverpool Football Club and a short global history of modern football.

Dorothy Odartey-Wellington
Dorothy Odartey-Wellington’s research expertise is in Afro-Hispanic literatures and cultures, Contemporary Spanish fiction and fictional narratives of migration in Spain. Her particular interests are in the work Equatorial Guinean and Saharawi diaspora writers in Spain. Her current research is focused on notions of national identity in Hispano-Saharan literature.

Sandra Parmegiani
Sandra Parmegiani’s research interests focus on the following areas: eighteenth and early nineteenth century Anglo-Italian relations, eighteenth century journalism, contemporary Italian literature and film, and digital humanities. She has published on Anglo-Italian literary and cultural relations, Italian Romanticism and contemporary Italian literature. Her current DH project focuses on the reception of English novels in Italian and French journalism in the long eighteenth century.

“Both of my advisors have been excellent. Not only have they been remarkably encouraging but also, they have held me and my work to a high standard. They push me to be a true scholar rather than just a student.”
– Shane Hubbard, 2018 MA European Studies

“My advisor provides me guidance in a comfortable and supportive environment where I am treated as an equal. I am encouraged to pursue my interests and develop my skills, while exploring new territory that challenges me. My advisor is genuinely interested in my work.”
– Trusha Dash, 2018 MA European Studies
